LIST OF PENDING CLAIMS

1-10. (Canceled)

11. (Previously amended) An architecture for an automation system, the automation system used to remotely control and monitor power-consuming devices drawing power from a power line in a building, the architecture comprising:

a lookup service maintaining a database of (1) the power-consuming devices including their attributes of device type and physical location, and (2) device objects corresponding to the power-consuming devices including a name for each device object mapped to at least one address;

a soft state store managing refresh information for the power-consuming devices and the device objects;

a publication/subscription eventing component enabling subscriptions to events related to changes in the refresh information managed by the soft state store; and, a power line monitor detecting superimposed transmissions from the power-consuming devices on the power line, which signal problems associated with the power-consuming devices.

12. (Previously amended) The architecture of claim 11, wherein the power line monitor uses pattern-based detection for detecting unacceptable power line activity.

13. (Previously amended) The architecture of claim 12, wherein the power line monitor matches power line patterns against unacceptable power line patterns stored in a pattern database.

14. (Previously amended) The architecture of claim 11, wherein the power line monitor uses model-based detection for detecting acceptable power line activity.

15. (Previously amended) The architecture of claim 14, wherein the power line monitor tests power line patterns against a pattern model of acceptable power line patterns.
